Beowulf

Only one copy of the poem that modern editors call Beowulf has survived, and it probably survived only by accident. A manuscript containing Beowulf and a small collection of other texts—a poetic treatment of the Old Testament story of Judith, a prose life of St. Christopher, and two treatises of fantastical geography known as The Wonders of the East and Alexander's Letter to Aristotle—was copied by two scribes, probably in the decade after 1000, in a monastic center somewhere in the south of England; it lay disregarded for centuries, narrowly escaped destruction by fire in 1731, and is now preserved in the British Library under the shelfmark Cotton Vitellius A.xv.

Beowulf is the longest surviving poem in Old English, consisting of 3,182 extant lines of alliterative verse divided into forty-four sections. Its language is allusive and embellished and its narrative digressive and complex, but its relatively straightforward plot follows the outlines of a folktale: a young hero who fights in isolation from friends and family engages in fabulous battles against monstrous foes, faces three challenges in ascending order of difficulty, and in the end wins glory and fame. The fabulous outlines of the story equally recall the deep undertones of myth: the mighty Beowulf may be a distant cousin of Thor, and his death may contain a hint of Ragnarok, the northern apocalypse.

But whatever its underlying structural patterns, Beowulf is neither myth nor folktale; its stories of dragon-slaying and night-battles are set against a complex background of legendary history. The action of the poem unfolds in a recognizable version of Scandinavia: Hrothgar’s hall Heorot has been plausibly placed in the village of Lejre on the Danish island of Zealand; Beowulf’s tribe of Geats may be the historical Gautar of Southern Sweden; and a number of the poem’s characters (Heremod, Hrothgar, Ingeld, and Hygelac) are mentioned in other sources as if they were figures of history rather than fable. Moreover, Beowulf is an intensely political poem; the poet seems as intrigued by Danish diplomacy and the bitter feud between the Geats and Swedes as he is by the hero’s monster-slaying. Kingdoms and successions, alliances and truces, loyalties and the tragically transient stability of heroic society are the poem’s somber subtext, a theme traced less in the clash of the battlefield than in the patterns of marriage and kin, in stories remembered and retold, in allusion and digression and pointed foreshadowing.

Despite the poem’s historical interests, we cannot read Beowulf with any modern expectation of historical accuracy. Like many medieval works, Beowulf is frustratingly ambivalent—not quite mythical enough to be read apart from the history it purports to contain, nor historical enough to furnish clear evidence for the past it poetically recreates. The action of the poem is set in a somewhat vague heroic geardagum (“bygone days”), an age not meant to be counted on a calendar, nor its kingdoms and tribes marked on a map. Nor, undoubtedly, were the monstrous races of Grendels and dragons so clearly distinct in the poet’s mind from the real dangers of the real world just beyond the margins of the known. While medieval authors certainly made distinctions between historia and fabula, the boundaries between these terms are not nearly as impermeable as those of our modern categories “history” and “fable.”

Both the ultimate and the immediate origins of Beowulf are unknown. Most scholars assume that the single surviving manuscript, written around 1000–20, is a copy of an earlier text, and probably the last in a long chain of copies. But it may be impossible to determine when that chain of texts began, or what cultural and literary milieu gave birth to the poem; proposed dates have ranged from 700 to 1000, and most years in between. The poem seems to arise from a world in which such stories were common, and it presupposes our own position in this world. The poem begins with the assumption that we are hearing a well-known story, or a least a story from a familiar milieu: “We have heard of the glory … of the folk-kings of the spear-Danes,” the poet asserts, and the way he tosses out cryptic allusions throughout the poem suggests that his audience was already familiar with songs and stories of other kings and heroes. But at what time in the history of the Anglo-Saxons did such a world exist? And can we trust the narrator as a faithful reporter of this world, or should we view him as a vivid creator of the illusion of antiquity?

The question of the origin of Beowulf is not just philological pedantry: the poem will yield very different meanings if it is imagined to have been produced in the time of Bede (c. 725, just a generation or two after the conversion of the English) or of Alfred (c. 880, a time of nation-building and political centralization) or of Ælfric (c. 1000, after half a century of monastic reform and a decade which saw the demoralizing collapse of national security). The earlier we think the poem to be, the more potentially authentic its historical material; the later we imagine it, the more openly fictional and nostalgic it seems. Moreover, the more closely we try to assign a date and place of origin to the poem, the more closely we read it as a text, the intention of a single author or a reflection of a particular ideology, rather than a product of a poetic art whose composition may have been oral and communal and whose traditional roots are beyond discovery.

Most critics agree that the heroic action of the poem is thoroughly accommodated to a world in which the truths of Christianity are accepted without question; they disagree, often sharply, on the meaning and purpose of that accommodation. Some scholars have argued that Beowulf is a type of Christ, because he gives his life for his people; others have read the poem as a condemnation of pagan pride, greed and violence. These two extreme positions capture the poem’s deliberate ambivalence: Beowulf is a secular Christian poem about pagans which avoids the easy alternatives of automatic condemnation or enthusiastic anachronism. The person responsible for putting Beowulf in its final form was certainly a Christian: the technology of writing in the Anglo-Saxon period was almost entirely a monopoly of the church. The manuscript in which Beowulf survives contains a saint’s legend and a versified Bible story, and the poet indicates a clear familiarity with the Bible and expects the same from his audience. Though the paganism of Beowulf’s world is downplayed, however, it is not denied; his age is connected to that of the audience but separated by the gulf of conversion and the seas of migration.

More recent work, rather than trying to define a single source for the poem’s complex and peculiar texture (whether that source is pure Germanic paganism or orthodox Augustinian Christianity), recognizes that Beowulf, like the culture of the Anglo-Saxons themselves, reflects a variety of interdependent and competing influences and attitudes, even a certain tension inherent in the combination of biblical, patristic, secular Latin, and popular Germanic material. The search for a single unified “audience” of Beowulf, and with it a sense of a single meaning, has given way to a recognition that there were many readers in Anglo-Saxon England, often with competing and conflicting interests.
Beowulf, lines 1–21
(British Library, Ms Cotton Vitellius A.xv, fol. 129r).
Beowulf

PROLOGUE

Listen!
We have heard of the glory in bygone days of the folk-kings of the spear-Danes, how those noble lords did lofty deeds.

Often Scyld Sceafing seized the mead-benches from many tribes, troops of enemies, struck fear into earls. Though he first was found a waif, he awaited solace for that—he grew under heaven and prospered in honor until every one of the encircling nations over the whale’s-riding had to obey him, grant him tribute. That was a good king! A boy was later born to him, young in the courts, whom God sent as a solace to the people—He saw their need, the dire distress they had endured, lordless, for such a long time. The Lord of Life, Wielder of Glory, gave him worldly honor; Beowulf, the son of Scyld, was renowned, his fame spread wide in Scandinavian lands.

Thus should a young man bring about good with pious gifts from his father’s possessions, so that later in life loyal comrades will stand beside him when war comes, the people will support him—with praiseworthy deeds a man will prosper among any people.

Scyld passed away at his appointed hour, the mighty lord went into the Lord’s keeping; they bore him down to the brimming sea,

His dear comrades, as he himself had commanded while the friend of the Scyldings wielded speech—that dear land-ruler had long held power.

In the harbor stood a ring-proved ship, icy, outbound, a nobleman’s vessel; there they laid down their dear lord, dispenser of rings, in the bosom of the ship, glorious, by the mast. There were many treasures loaded there, adornments from distant lands; I have never heard of a more lovely ship bedecked with battle-weapons and war-gear, blades and byrnes, in its bosom lay many treasures, which were to travel far with him into the keeping of the flood. With no fewer gifts did they furnish him there, the wealth of nations, than those did who at his beginning first sent him forth alone over the waves while still a small child. Then they set a golden ensign high over his head, and let the waves have him, gave him to the Deep with grieving spirits, mournful in mind. Men do not know how to say truly—not trusted counselors, nor heroes under the heavens—who received that cargo.

Then Beowulf Scylding, beloved king, was famous in the strongholds of his folk for a long while—his father having passed away, a lord from earth—until after him arose the great Healfdene, who held the glorious Scyldings all his life, ancient and fierce in battle. Four children, all counted up, were born to that bold leader of hosts: Heorogar, Hrothgar, and Halga the Good, I heard that … was Onela’s queen,

---

1 Beowulf This translation is by R.M. Liuzza, from the edition published by Broadview Press.

2 spear-Danes The Danes are described by many different epithets in the poem.

3 Scyld Sceafing The name means “Shield, Son of Sheaf” (i.e., of grain). The mysterious origins of Scyld, who seems to arrive providentially from nowhere and is returned to the sea after his death, have occasioned much critical speculation.

4 whale’s-riding A condensed descriptive image of the sea—the riding-place of whales. Elsewhere the sea is the “gannet’s bath” and the “swan’s riding.”

5 Beowulf Not the monster-slaying hero of the title, but an early Danish king. Many scholars argue that the original name was Beow.

6 Scyldings The Danes, “sons of Scyld.”

7 byrnie Coat of ring-mail.

8 With no fewer … small child Scyld was found destitute—this statement is an example of litotes, or ironic understatement, not uncommon in Anglo-Saxon poetry.

9 A name is missing from the manuscript here; it has been conjectured from parallel sources that it should be Yrse, or Ursula. The Swedish (“Scyfling”) king Onela appears later in the story, causing much distress to Beowulf’s nation.
Then success in war was given to Hrothgar, honor in battle, so that his beloved kinsmen eagerly served him, until the young soldiers grew into a mighty troop of men. It came to his mind that he should order a hall-building, which the sons of men should remember forever, and there inside he would share everything with young and old that God had given him, except for the common land and the lives of men. Then the work, as I’ve heard, was widely proclaimed to many nations throughout this middle-earth, to come adorn the folk-stead. It came to pass swiftly among men, and it was soon ready, the greatest of halls; he gave it the name “Heorot,” he who ruled widely with his work. A bold demon who waited in darkness wretchedly suffered all the while, for every day he heard the joyful din loud in the hall, with the harp’s sound, the clear song of the scop. He said who was able to tell of the origin of men that the Almighty created the earth, a bright and shining plain, by seas embraced, and set, triumphantly, to light their beams for those who dwell on land, adorned the distant corners of the world with leaves and branches, and made life also, all manner of creatures that live and move.

---

1 a great ... forever Or “a greater meadhall / than the sons of men had ever heard of.” The reading adopted here is that of Mitchell and Robinson.
2 Heorot “Hart.” An object recovered from the burial-mound at Sutton Hoo, perhaps a royal insignia, is surmounted by the image of a hart.
3 it awaited ... violence The hall Heorot is apparently fated to be destroyed in a battle between Hrothgar and his son-in-law Ingeld the Heathobard, a conflict predicted by Beowulf at 204–69. The battle itself happens outside the action of the poem.
4 scop Poet-singer.

---

5 Cain ... Abel See Genesis 4.1–16.
6 thanes Companions of a king.
Then it was easy to find a thane
who sought his rest elsewhere, farther away,
a bed in the outbuildings,\(^1\) when was pointed out—
truly announced with clear tokens—
that hall-thane’s hate; he kept himself afterwards
farther and safer, who escaped the fiend.
So he ruled, and strove against right,
one against all, until empty stood
the best of houses. And so for a great while—for twelve long winters the lord of the Scyldings
suffered his grief, every sort of woe,
great sorrow, for to the sons of men
it became known, and carried abroad
in sad tales, that Grendel strove
long with Hrothgar, bore his hatred,
sins and feuds, for many seasons,
perpetual conflict; he wanted no peace
with any man of the Danish army,
nor ceased his deadly hatred, nor settled with money,
nor did any of the counselors need to expect bright compensation from the killer’s hands,\(^2\)
for the great ravager relentlessly stalked,
a dark death-shadow, lurked and struck
old and young alike, in perpetual night
held the misty moors. Men do not know
whither such whispering demons wander about.

Thus the foe of mankind, fearsome and solitary,
often committed his many crimes,
cruel humiliations; he occupied Heorot,
the jewel-adorned hall, in the dark nights—
he saw no need to salute the throne,
he scorned the treasures; he did not know their love.\(^3\)
That was deep misery to the lord of the Danes,
a breaking of spirit. Many a strong man sat

in secret counsel, considered advice,
what would be best for the brave at heart
to save themselves from the sudden attacks.

At times they offered honor to idols
at pagan temples, prayed aloud
that the soul-slayer\(^4\) might offer assistance
in the country’s distress. Such was their custom,
the hope of heathens—they remembered Hell
in their minds, they did not know the Maker,
the Judge of deeds, they did not know the Lord God,
or even how to praise the heavenly Protector, Wielder of glory. Woe unto him
who must thrust his soul through wicked force
in the fire’s embrace, expect no comfort,
no way to change at all! It shall be well for him
who can seek the Lord after his deathday
and find security in the Father’s embrace.

With the sorrows of that time the son of Healfdene\(^5\)
seethed constantly; nor could the wise hero
turn aside his woe—too great was the strife,
long and loathsome, which befell that nation,
vigorous, grim, cruel, greatest of night-evils.

Thus from his home the thane of Hygelac,\(^6\)
a good man among the Geats, heard of Grendel’s deeds—
he was of mankind the strongest of might
in those days of this life,
noble and mighty. He commanded to be made a good wave-cropper, said that that war-king
he would seek out over the swan’s-riding,
the renowned prince, when he was in need of men.
Wise men did not dissuade him at all
from that journey, though he was dear to them;
they encouraged his bold spirit, inspected the omens.

From the Geatish nation that good man
had chosen the boldest champions, the best
he could find; one of fifteen,
he sought the sea-wood. A wise sailor
showed the way to the edge of the shore.

The time came—the craft was on the waves,

---
\(^1\) outbuildings  Hrothgar’s hall is apparently surrounded by smaller buildings, including the women’s quarters (see lines 662–5, 920–4). Under normal circumstances the men sleep together in the hall, ready for battle (1239–50).

\(^2\) bright compensation  Germanic and Anglo-Saxon law allowed that a murderer could make peace with the family of his victim by paying compensation, or wergild. The amount of compensation varied with the rank of the victim.

\(^3\) Thus the foe . . . love  This is a much-disputed passage; this reading follows a suggestion made by Fred C. Robinson in “Why is Grendel’s Not Greeting the giftið a wæc micel?” and repeated in Mitchell and Robinson’s Beowulf.

\(^4\) soul-slayer  The Devil.

\(^5\) son of Healfdene  i.e., Hrothgar.

\(^6\) thane of Hygelac  i.e., Beowulf.
moored under the cliffs. Eager men climbed on the prow—the currents eddied, sea against sand—the soldiers bore into the bosom of the ship their bright gear, fine polished armor; the men pushed off on their wished-for journey in that wooden vessel. Over the billowing waves, urged by the wind, the foamy-necked floater flew like a bird, until in due time on the second day the curved-prowed vessel had come so far that the seafarers sighted land, shining shore-cliffs, steep mountains, wide headlands—then the waves were crossed, the journey at an end. Thence up quickly the people of the Weders' climbed onto the plain, moored their ship, shook out their mail-shirts, their battle-garments; they thanked God that the sea-paths had been smooth for them.

When from the wall the Scyldings' watchman, whose duty it was to watch the sea-cliffs, saw them bear down the gangplank bright shields, ready battle-gear, he was bursting with curiosity in his mind to know who these men were. This thane of Hrothgar rode his horse down to the shore, and shook mightily his strong spear, and spoke a challenge: “What are you, warriors in armor, wearing coats of mail, who have come thus sailing over the sea-road in a tall ship, hither over the waves? Long have I been the coast-warden, and kept sea-watch so that no enemies with fleets and armies should ever attack the land of the Danes. Never more openly have there ever come shield-bearers here, nor have you heard any word of leave from our warriors or consent of kinsmen. I have never seen a greater earl on earth than that one among you, a man in war-gear; that is no mere courtier, honored only in weapons—unless his looks belie him, his noble appearance! Now I must know your lineage, lest you go hence as false spies, travel further into Danish territory. Now, you sea-travelers from a far-off land, listen to my simple thought—the sooner the better, you must make clear from whence you have come.”

The eldest one answered him, leader of the troop, unlocked his word-hoard:

“We are men of the Geatish nation and Hygelac's hearth-companions. My father was well-known among men, a noble commander named Ecgmund; he saw many winters before he passed away, ancient, from the court; nearly everyone throughout the world remembers him well. With a friendly heart have we come seeking your lord, the son of Healfdene, guardian of his people; be of good counsel to us! We have a great mission to that famous man, ruler of the Danes; nor should any of it be hidden, I think. You know, if things are as we have truly heard tell, that among the Scyldings some sort of enemy, hidden evildoer, in the dark nights manifests his terrible and mysterious violence, shame and slaughter. With a generous spirit I can counsel Hrothgar, advise him how, wise old king, he may overcome this fiend—

if a change should ever come for him, a remedy for the evil of his afflictions, and his seething cares turn cooler; or forever afterwards a time of anguish he shall suffer, his sad necessity, while there stands in its high place the best of houses.”

The watchman spoke, as he sat on his horse, a fearless officer: “A sharp shield-warrior must be a judge of both things, words and deeds, if he would think well.

I understand that to the Scylding lord you are a friendly force. Go forth, and bear weapons and armor—I shall guide your way; and I will command my young companions to guard honorably against all enemies your ship, newly-tarred, upon the sand, to watch it until the curved-necked wood bears hence across the ocean-streams

1 Weders  I.e., Geats.
a beloved man to the borders of the Weders—and such of these good men as will be granted that they survive the storm of battle.”

They set off—their vessel stood still, the roomy ship rested in its riggings, fast at anchor. Boar-figures shone over gold-plated cheek-guards,1 gleaming, fire-hardened; they guarded the lives of the grim battle-minded. The men hastened, marched together, until they could make out the timbered hall, splendid and gold-adorned—the most famous building among men under the heavens—where the high king waited; its light shone over many lands.

Their brave guide showed them the bright court of the mighty ones, so that they might go straight to it; that fine soldier wheeled his horse and spoke these words: “Time for me to go. The almighty Father guard you in his grace, safe in your journeys! I must to the sea, and hold my watch against hostile hordes.”

The road was stone-paved, the path led the men together. Their mail coats shone hard, hand-linked, bright rings of iron rang out on their gear, when right to the hall they went trooping in their terrible armor. Sea-weary, they set their broad shields, wondrously-hard boards, against the building’s wall; they sat on a bench—their byrnis rang out, their soldiers’ war-gear; their spears stood, the gear of the seamen all together, a gray forest of ash. That iron troop was worthy of its weapons.

Then a proud warrior3 asked those soldiers about their ancestry: “From whence do you carry those covered shields, gray coats of mail and grim helmets, this troop of spears? I am herald and servant to Hrothgar; never have I seen so many foreign men so fearless and bold. For your pride, I expect, not for exile, and for greatness of heart you have sought out Hrothgar.”

The courageous one answered him, proud prince of the Weders, spoke words hardly in his helmet: “We are Hygelac’s board-companions—Beowulf is my name. I wish to explain my errand to the son of Healfdene, famous prince, your lord, if he will allow us, in his goodness, to greet him.” Wulfgar spoke—a prince of the Wendels, his noble character was known to many, his valor and wisdom: “I will convey to the friend of the Danes, lord of the Scyldings, giver of rings, what you have requested, tell the famous prince of your travels, and then quickly announce to you the answer which that good man sees fit to give me.”

He hastily returned to where Hrothgar sat old and gray-haired, with his band of earls; he boldly went, stood by the shoulder of the Danish king—he knew the noble custom. Wulfgar spoke to his friend and lord: “There have arrived here over the sea’s expanse, come from afar, men of the Geats; the oldest among them, the fighting men call Beowulf. They have requested that they, my lord, might be allowed to exchange words with you—do not refuse them your reply, gracious Hrothgar! In their war-trappings they seem worthy of noble esteem; notable indeed is that chief who has shown these soldiers the way hither.”

Hrothgar spoke, protector of the Scyldings: “I knew him when he was nothing but a boy—his old father was called Ecgtheow,
to whom Hræthel the Geat\(^1\) gave in marriage
his only daughter; now his daring son
has come here, sought a loyal friend.
Seafarers, in truth, have said to me,
those who brought to the Geats gifts and money
as thanks, that he has thirty
men’s strength, strong in battle,
in his handgrip. Holy God
in His grace has guided him to us,
to the West-Danes, as I would hope,
against Grendel’s terror. To this good man
I shall offer treasures for his true daring.
Be hasty now, bid them enter
to see this troop of kinsmen all assembled;
and tell them in your words that they are welcome
to the Danish people.”

He announced from within:\(^2\)
“My conquering lord commands me to tell you,
ruler of the East-Danes, that he knows your ancestry,
and you are to him, hardy spirits,
welcome hither from across the rolling waves.
Now you may go in your war-gear
under your helmets to see Hrothgar,
but let your battle-shields and deadly spears
await here the result of your words.”

The mighty one arose, and many a man with him,
powerful thanes; a few waited there,
guarded their battle-dress as the bold man bid them.
They hastened together as the man led them,
under Heorot’s roof; [the warrior went]\(^3\)
hardy in his helmet, until he stood on the hearth.
Beowulf spoke—his byrnie gleamed on him,
war-net sewn by the skill of a smith—:
“Be well, Hrothgar! I am Hygelac’s kinsman
and young retainer; in my youth I have done
many a glorious deed. This business with Grendel
was made known to me on my native soil;
seafarers say that this building stands,
most excellent of halls, idle and useless
to every man, after evening’s light
is hidden under heaven’s gleaming dome.
Then my own people advised me,
the best warriors and the wisest men,
that I should, lord Hrothgar, seek you out,
because they knew the might of my strength;
they themselves had seen me, bloodstained from battle,
come from the fight, when I captured five,
slew a tribe of giants, and on the salt waves
fought sea-monsters by night, survived that tight spot,
avenged the Weders’ affliction—they asked for trouble—
and crushed those grim foes; and now with Grendel,
that monstrous beast, I shall by myself have a word or two with that giant. From you now I wish,
ruler of the Bright-Danes, to request,
protector of the Scyldings, a single favor,
that you not refuse me, having come this far,
protector of warriors, noble friend to his people—
that I might alone, O my own band of earls
and this hardy troop, cleanse Heorot.
I have also heard that this evil beast
in his wildness does not care for weapons,
so I too will scorn—so that Hygelac,
my liege-lord, may be glad of me—
to bear a sword or a broad shield,
a yellow battle-board, but with my grip
I shall grapple with the fiend and fight for life,
foe against foe. Let him put his faith in the Lord’s judgment, whom death takes!
I expect that he will, if he is allowed to win,
eat unafraid the folk of the Geats
in that war-hall, as he has often done,
the host of the Hræthmen.\(^4\) You’ll have no need
to cover my head—he will have done so,
gory, bloodstained, if death bears me away;
he will take his kill, think to taste me,
will dine alone without remorse,
stain his lair in the moor; no need to linger
in sorrow over disposing of my body!
Send on to Hygelac, if battle should take me,
the best battdress, which my breast wears,
finest of garments; it is Hræthel’s heirloom,

---

1. Hræthel the Geat Father of Hygelac and grandfather of Beowulf.
2. people … within There is no gap in the manuscript, but the two halves of the line do not alliterate, and something is probably missing from the text at this point. Most editors add two half-lines with the sense “Then Wulfgar went to the door.”
3. [the warrior went] A half-line is missing; the translation follows the most innocuous conjecture.
4. Hræthmen i.e., Geats.
the work of Weland. Wyrd always goes as it must!

Hrothgar spoke, protector of the Scyldings: “For past favors, my friend Beowulf, and for old deeds, you have sought us out. Your father struck up the greatest of feuds, when he killed Heatholaf by his own hand among the Wylfings. When the Weder tribe would not harbor him for fear of war, thence he sought the South-Dane people over the billowing seas, the Honor-Scyldings; then I first ruled the Danish folk and held in my youth this grand kingdom, city of treasure and heroes—then Hrothgar was dead, my older brother unliving, Healfdene’s firstborn—he was better than I! Later I settled that feud with fee-money; I sent to the Wylfings over the crest of the waves ancient treasures; he swore oaths to me. It is a sorrow to my very soul to say to any man what Grendel has done to me—humiliated Heorot with his hateful thoughts, his sudden attacks. My hall-troop, my warriors, are decimated; wyrd has swept them away into Grendel’s terror. God might easily put an end to the deeds of this mad enemy! Often men have boasted, drunk with beer, officers over their cups of ale, that they would abide in the beerhall Grendel’s attack with a rush of sword-terror. Then in the morning this meadhall, lordly dwelling, was drenched with blood, when daylight gleamed, the benches gory, the hall spattered and befouled; I had fewer dear warriors when death took them away. Now sit down at my feast, drink mead in my hall, men’s reward of victory, as your mood urges.”

Then a bench was cleared in the beerhall for the men of the Geats all together; the strong-minded men went to sit down, proud in their strength. Athane did his service, bore in his hands the gold-bright ale-cup, poured the clear sweet drink. The scop sang brightly in Heorot—there was the joy of heroes, no small gathering of Danes and Geats.

Unferth spoke, son of Ecglog, who sat at the feet of the Scylding lord, unbound his battle-runes—Beowulf’s journey, that brave seafarer, sorely vexed him, for he did not wish that any other man on this middle-earth should care for glory under the heavens, more than he himself: “Are you the Beowulf who strove with Breca in a swimming contest on the open sea, where in your pride you tried the waves and for a foolish boast risked your life in the deep water? No man, whether friend or foe, could dissuade you two from that sad venture, when you swam in the sea; there you seized in your arms the ocean-streams, measured the sea-ways, flailed your hands and glided over the waves—the water roiled, wintry surges. In the keeping of the water you toiled for seven nights, and he outswam you, and had more strength. Then in the morning the swells bore him to the Heathoream shore; from thence he sought his own sweet land, beloved by his people, the land of the Brondings, the fair fortress, where he had his folk.

1. Weland  Legendary blacksmith of the Norse gods. The antiquity of weapons and armor added to their value.
2. Wyrd  The Old English word for “fate” is sometimes quasi-personified, though apparently not to the extent that the goddess Fortuna was in Roman poetic mythology. The word survives, via Shakespeare’s Macbeth, as the Modern English word “weird.”
3. I sent … me  Hrothgar pays the wergild for the man Ecgtheow killed, and Ecgtheow swears an oath of loyalty and support. It is this oath, passed on to the next generation, that Beowulf is fulfilling (at least this is Hrothgar’s public sentiment; his thoughts in the privacy of his council are somewhat different).

4. Neow sit … hall  The meaning of this line in Old English is disputed.
5. Unferth  Unferth’s name, which may be significant, means either “un-peace” or “un-reason.” In the manuscript it is always spelled “Hunferth,” though it alliterates with a vowel. His position at Hrothgar’s feet appears to be one of honor.
6. unbound his battle-runes  Or “unleashed his hostile secret thoughts.” Run in Old English often means “secret.”
his castle and treasure. He truly fulfilled,
the son of Beanstan, his boast against you.
525
So I expect a worse outcome from you—
though you may have survived the storm of battle,
some grim combats—if for Grendel you dare
to lie in wait the whole night long.” 530
Beowulf spoke, son of Ecgtheow:

“What a great deal, Unferth my friend,
drunk with beer, you have said about Breca,
told his adventures! I will tell the truth—
I had greater strength on the sea,
more ordeals on the waves than any other man.
535
When we were just boys we two agreed
and boasted—we were both still
in our youth—that out on the great ocean
we would risk our lives, and we did just that.
We had bare swords, when we swam in the sea,
hard in our hands; we thought to protect ourselves from whales. Not for anything
could he swim far from me on the sea-waves,
more swiftly on the water, nor would I go from him.
We two were together on the sea 540
for five nights, until the flood drove us apart,
surging waves, coldest of weathers,
darkening night, and a northern wind,
knife-sharp, pushed against us. The seas were choppy;
the fishes of the sea were stirred up by it.
545
There my coat of armor offered help,
hard, hand-locked, against those hostile ones,
my woven battle-dress lay on my breast
adorned with gold. Down to the ocean floor
a grisly foe dragged me, gripped me fast 550
in his grim grasp, yet it was given to me
to stab that monster with the point of my sword,
my war-blade; the storm of battle took away
that mighty sea-beast, through my own hand.

9

“Time and again those terrible enemies
sorely threatened me. I served them well
with my dear sword, as they deserved.
560
They got no joy from their gluttony,
those wicked maneaters, when they tasted me,
sat down to their feast on the ocean floor—
but in the morning, wounded by my blade,
they were washed ashore by the ocean waves,
dazed by sword-blows, and since that day 565
they never hindered the passage of any sea-voyager. Light shone from the east,
God’s bright beacon; the waves grew calm,
so that I could see the sea-cliffs,
the windswept capes. Wyrd often spares
an undoomed man, when his courage endures!
And so it came about that I was able to kill five of these sea-monsters. I have never heard of a harder night-battle under heaven’s vault,
nor a more wretched man on the water’s stream;
yet I escaped alive from the clutches of my enemies,
weary from my journey. Then the sea washed me up,
the currents of the flood, in the land of the Finns,
the welling waters. I have never heard a word about any such contest concerning you,
such sword-panic. In the play of battle Breca has never—nor you either—
done a deed so bold and daring 575
with his decorated blade—I would never boast of it!—
though you became your brothers’ killer,
your next of kin; for that you needs must suffer
punishment in Hell, no matter how clever you are.1

580
I will say it truly, son of Ecglaef,
that never would Grendel have worked such terror,
that gruesome beast, against your lord,
or shames in Heorot, if your courage and spirit
were as fierce as you yourself fancy they are;
585
but he has found that he need fear no feud,
no storm of swords from the Victory-Scyldings,
no resistance at all from your nation;
he takes his toll, spares no one
in the Danish nation, but indulges himself, 590
hacks and butchers and expects no battle
from the Spear-Danes. But I will show him
soon enough the strength and courage
of the Geats in war. Afterwards, let him who will

1 though you became ... you are Unferth’s fratricide brings the general theme of kin-slaying, represented by Grendel’s descent from Cain, inside Hrothgar’s hall. In reality—at least in the reality of the heroic world depicted in poetry—it may not have been unthinkable
for kinsmen to find themselves on opposite sides of a battle; loyalty to one’s lord was supposed to outweigh the claims of blood-relation.
The word “Hell” is not in the manuscript, but it is attested by one of the early transcriptions. Some scholars read halle, i.e., “hall.”
go bravely to mead, when the morning light
of a new day, the sun clothed in glory
shines from the south on the sons of men!”

Then the giver of treasure was greatly pleased,
gray-haired and battle-bold; the Bright-Danes’ chief
had faith in his helper; that shepherd of his folk recognized Beowulf’s firm resolution.

There was man’s laughter, lovely sounds
and winsome words. Wealthy thew went forth, Hrothgar’s queen, mindful of customs;
adorned with gold, she greeted the men in the hall,
then that courteous wife offered the full cup
first to the guardian of the East-Danes’ kingdom,
bid him be merry at his beer-drinking,
beloved by his people; with pleasure he received
the feast and cup, victorious king.

The lady of the Helming then went about
to young and old, gave each his portion of the precious cup, until the moment came
when the ring-adorned queen, of excellent heart,
bore the mead-cup to Beowulf;
she greeted the Geatish prince, thanked God
with wise words that her wish had come to pass,
that she could rely on any earl for relief
from those crimes. He took the cup,
the fierce warrior, from Wealthy thew,
and then eager for battle he made his announcement.

Beowulf spoke, son of Ecgtheow:
“I resolved when I set out over the waves,
sat down in my ship with my troop of soldiers,
that I would entirely fulfill the wishes
of your people, or fall slain,
fast in the grip of my foe. I shall perform
a deed of manly courage, or in this meadhall
I will await the end of my days!”

These words well pleased that woman,
the boasting of the Geat; she went, the gold-adorned
and courteous folk-queen, to sit beside her lord.

Then, as before, there in that hall were
strong words spoken, the people happy,
the sounds of a victorious nation, until shortly
the son of Healfdene wished to seek
his evening rest; he knew that the wretched beast
had been planning to do battle in the high building
from the time they could first see the sunrise
until night fell darkening over all,
and creatures of shadow came creeping about pale under the clouds. The company arose.
One warrior greeted another there,
Hrothgar to Beowulf, and wished him luck,
gave him control of the wine-hall in these words:

“I have never entrusted to any man,
ever since I could hold and hoist a shield,
the great hall of the Danes—except to you now.
Have it and hold it, protect this best of houses,
be mindful of glory, show your mighty valor,
watch for your enemies! You will have all you desire,
if you emerge from this brave undertaking alive.”

Then Hrothgar and his troop of heroes,
protector of the Scyldings, departed from the hall;
the war-chief wished to seek Wealthy thew,
his queen’s bedchamber. The glorious king
had set against Grendel a hall-guardian
— as men had heard said—who did special service
for the king of the Danes, kept a giant-watch.
Surely the Geatish prince greatly trusted
his mighty strength, the Maker’s favor,
when he took off his iron byrnie,
undid his helmet, and gave his decorated iron,
best of swords, to his servant
and bid him hold his battle-gear.

The good man, Beowulf the Geat,
spoke a few boasting words before he lay down:
“I consider myself no poorer in strength
and battle-deeds than Grendel does himself;
and so I will not kill him with a sword,
put an end to his life, though I easily might;
he knows no arts of war, no way to strike back,
hack at my shield-boss, though he be brave
in his wicked deeds; but tonight we two will forsake our swords, if he dare to seek out
a war without weapons—and then let the wise Lord
grant the judgment of glory, the holy God,
to whichever hand seems proper to Him.”

He lay down, battle-brave; the bolster took
the earl’s cheek, and around him many

1 The glorious king Or “King of Glory,” i.e., God?
a bold seafarer sank to his hall-rest.
None of them thought that he should thence ever again seek his own dear homeland, his tribe or the town in which he was raised, for they had heard it said that savage death had swept away far too many of the Danish folk in that wine-hall. But the Lord gave them a web of victory, the people of the Weders, comfort and support, so that they completely, through one man’s craft, overcame their enemy, by his own might. It is a well-known truth that mighty God has ruled mankind always and forever.

In the dark night he came creeping, the shadow-goer. The bowmen slept who were to hold that horned hall—all but one. It was well-known to men that the demon foe could not drag them under the dark shadows if the Maker did not wish it; but he, wakeful, keeping watch for his enemy, awaited, enraged, the outcome of battle.

Then from the moor, in a blanket of mist, Grendel came stalking—he bore God’s anger; the evil marauder meant to ensnare some of human-kind in that high hall. Under the clouds he came until he clearly knew he was near the wine-hall, men’s golden house, finely adorned. It was not the first time he had sought out the home of Hrothgar, but never in his life, early or late, did he find harder luck or a harder hall-thane.

To the hall came that warrior on his journey, bereft of joys. The door burst open, fast in its forged bands, when his fingers touched it; bloody-minded, swollen with rage, he swung open the hall’s mouth, and immediately afterwards the fiend strode across the paved floor, went angrily; in his eyes stood a light not fair, glowing like fire. He saw in the hall many a soldier, a peaceful troop sleeping all together, a large company of thanes—and he laughed inside; he meant to divide, before day came, this loathsome creature, the life of each man from his body, when there befell him the hope of a feast. But it was not his fate to taste any more of the race of mankind after that night. The kinsman of Hygelac, mighty one, beheld how that maneater planned to proceed with his sudden assault. Not that the monster’s meant to delay—he seized at once at his first pass a sleeping man, slit him open suddenly, bit into his joints, drank the blood from his veins, gobbled his flesh in gobbets, and soon had completely devoured that dead man, feet and fingertips. He stepped further, and took in his hands the strong-hearted man in his bed; the monster reached out towards him with his hands—he quickly grabbed him with evil intent, and sat up against his arm.

As soon as that shepherd of sins discovered that he had never met on middle-earth, in any region of the world, another man with a greater handgrip, in his heart he was afraid for his life, but none the sooner could he flee. His mind was eager to escape to the darkness, seek out a host of devils—his habit there was nothing like he had ever met before. The good kinsman of Hygelac remembered then his evening speech, and stood upright and seized him fast. His fingers burst; the giant turned outward, the earl stepped inward. The notorious one meant—if he might—to turn away further and flee, away to his lair in the fen; he knew his fingers were held in a hostile grip. That was an unhappy journey that the harm-doer took to Heorot! The great hall resounded; to the Danes it seemed, the city’s inhabitants, and every brave earl, like a wild ale-sharing. Both were angry, fierce house-wardens—the hall echoed. It was a great wonder that the wine-hall withstood their fighting and did not fall to the ground, that fair building—but it was fastened inside and out with iron bands, forged with skill. From the floor there flew many a mead-bench, as men have told me, gold-adorned, where those grim foes fought. The Scylding elders had never expected that any man, by any ordinary means, could break it apart, beautiful, bone-adorned, or destroy it with guile, unless the embrace of fire might swallow it in flames. The noise swelled new and stark—among the North-Danes was horrible terror, in each of them who heard through the wall the wailing cry—God’s adversary shrieked a grisly song of horror, defeated, the captive of Hell bemoaned his pain. He pinned him fast, he who among men was the strongest of might in those days of this life.

That protector of earls would not for anything let that murderous visitor escape alive—he did not consider his days on earth of any use at all. Many an earl in Beowulf’s troop drew his old blade, longed to protect the life of his liege-lord, the famous captain, however they could. But they did not know as they entered the fight, those stern-minded men of battle, and thought to strike from all sides and seek his soul, that no sword, not the best iron anywhere in the world, could even touch that evil sinner, for he had worked a curse on weapons, every sort of blade. His separation from the world in those days of this life would have to be miserable, and that alien spirit would travel far into the keeping of fiends. Then he discovered, who had done before were they dismayed by the loss of their mead-hall? Or does OE ealh mean “luck”?

so much harm to the race of mankind, so many crimes—he was marked by God—that his body could bear it no longer, but the courageous kinsman of Hygelac had him in hand—hateful to each

was the life of the other. The loathsome creature felt great bodily pain; a gaping wound opened in his shoulder-joint, his sinews sprang apart, his joints burst asunder. Beowulf was given glory in battle—Grendel was forced to flee, mortally wounded, into the fen-slopes, seek a sorry abode; he knew quite surely that the end of his life had arrived, the sum of his days. The will of the Danes was entirely fulfilled in that bloody onslaught! He who had come from afar had cleansed, wise and stout-hearted, the hall of Hrothgar, warded off attack. He rejoiced in his night-work, his great courage. That man of the Geats had fulfilled his boast to the East-Danes, and entirely remedied all their distress, the insidious sorrows they had suffered and had to endure from sad necessity, no small affliction. It was a clear sign, when the battle-brave one laid down the hand, arm and shoulder—there all together was Grendel’s claw—under the curved roof.

Then in the morning was many a warrior, as I have heard, around that gift-hall, leaders of the folk came from far and near throughout the wide land to see that wonder, the loathsome one’s tracks. His parting from life hardly seemed sad to any man who examined the trail of that inglorious one, how he went on his weary way, defeated by force, to a pool of sea-monsters, doomed, put to flight, and left a fatal trail. The water was welling with blood there—the terrible swirling waves, all mingled together with hot gore, heaved with the blood of battle, concealed that doomed one when, deprived of joys, he laid down his life in his lair in the fen, his heathen soul—and Hell took him.
Then the old retainers returned from there, and many a youth on the joyful journey, bravely rode their horses back from the mere, men on their steeds. There they celebrated Beowulf’s glory: it was often said that south or north, between the two seas,\(^1\) across the wide world, there was none better under the sky’s expanse among shield-warriors, nor more worthy to rule—though they found no fault with their own friendly lord, gracious Hrothgar, but said he was a good king. At times the proud warriors let their horses prance, their fallow mares far in a contest, wherever the footpaths seemed fair to them, the way tried and true. At times the king’s thane, full of grand stories, mindful of songs, who remembered much, a great many of the old tales, found other words truly bound together; he began again to recite with skill the adventure of Beowulf, adepty tell an apt tale, and weave his words. He said nearly all that he had heard said of Sigemund’s stirring deeds;\(^2\) many strange things, the Volsung’s strife, his distant voyages obscure, unknown to all the sons of men, his feuds and crimes—except for Fitela, when of such things he wished to speak to him, uncle to nephew\(^3\)—for always they were, in every combat, companions at need; a great many of the race of giants they slaughtered with their swords. For Sigemund no small fame grew after his final day, after that hardened soldier, prince’s son, had killed a dragon, keeper of a hoard; alone, he dared to go under gray stones, a bold deed—nor was Fitela by his side; yet so it befell him that his sword pierced the wondrous serpent, stood fixed in the wall, the manly iron; the dragon met his death. That fierce creature had gone forth in courage so that he could possess that store of rings and use them at his will; the son of Wæls loaded his sea-boat, bore the bright treasure to the ship’s hold. The serpent melted in its own heat. He was the most famous of exiles, far and wide, among all people, protector of warriors, for his noble deeds—he had prospered for them—since the struggles of Heremod had ceased, his might and valor. Among the Eotens\(^4\) he was betrayed into his enemies’ hands, quickly dispatched. The surging of cares had crippled him too long; he became a deadly burden to his own people, to all noblemen; for many a wise man had mourned in earlier times over his headstrong ways who had looked to him for relief from affliction, hoped that that prince’s son would prosper, receive his father’s rank, rule his people, hoard and fortress, a kingdom of heroes, the Scylding homeland. The kinsman of Hygelac became to all of the race of mankind a more pleasant friend; sin possessed him.\(^5\)

Sometimes, competing, the fallow paths they measured on horseback. When morning’s light raced on and fastened away, many a retainer, stout-hearted, went to see the high hall to see the strange wonder; the king himself, guard of the treasure-hoard, strode glorious from the woman’s chambers with a great entourage,

---

1. between the two seas  A conventional expression like Modern English “coast to coast”; probably it originally referred to the North and Baltic seas.
2. He said ... deeds  Beowulf is praised indirectly, by being compared first to Sigemund, another famous monster-slayer (a different version of whose story is told in the Old Norse Volsungasaga and the Middle High German Nibelungenlied; there the dragon-slaying is attributed to Sigemund’s son Siegfried), and then contrasted to Heremod, an earlier king of the Danes who descended into tyranny (it is sometimes assumed that the disastrous ending of Heremod’s reign is the cause of the Danes’ lordlessness and distress mentioned at the beginning of the poem). The implication is that Beowulf’s deeds place him in the ranks of other exemplary figures. The method of narration is allusive and indirect, as though the audience were expected to know the details of the story and appreciate an elliptical reference to them.
3. uncle to nephew  Fitela is actually Sigemund’s son by his own sister—either the poet is being discreet, or his version of the story differs from the Norse.
4. Eotens  Perhaps “Jutes.” The word literally means “giants” and may be a tribal name, or an epithet, or may in fact refer to an actual race of giants.
5. sin possessed him  I.e., Heremod.
a chosen retinue, and his royal queen with him measured the meadhall-path with a troop of maidens.

Hrothgar spoke—he went to the hall, stood on the steps, beheld the steep roof plated with gold, and Grendel’s hand: “For this sight let us swiftly offer thanks to the Almighty! Much have I endured of dire grief from Grendel, but God may always work, Shepherd of glory, wonder upon wonder. It was not long ago that I did not expect ever in my life to experience relief from any of my woes, when, stained with blood, this best of houses stood dripping, gory, a widespread woe to all wise men who did not expect that they might ever defend the people’s fortress from its foes, devils and demons. Now a retainer has done the very deed, through the might of God, which we all could not contrive to do with all our cleverness. Lo, that woman could say, whosoever has borne such a son into the race of men, if she still lives, that the God of Old was good to her in childbearing. Now I will cherish you, Beowulf, best of men, like a son in my heart; hold well henceforth your new kinship. You shall have no lack of the worldly goods which I can bestow. Often have I offered rewards for less, honored with gifts a humbler man, weaker in battle. Now by yourself you have done such deeds that your fame will endure always and forever—may the Almighty reward you with good, as He has already done!”

Beowulf spoke, son of Ecgtheow: “Freely and gladly have we fought this fight, done this deed of courage, daringly faced this unknown power. I would much prefer that you might have seen the foe himself decked in his finery, fallen and exhausted!

With a hard grip I hoped to bind him quickly and keenly on the killing floor, so that for my handgrasp he would have to lie squirming for life, unless he might slip away; I could not—the Creator did not wish it—hinder his going, no matter how hard I held that deadly enemy; too overwhelming was that fiend’s flight. Yet he forfeited his hand, his arm and shoulder, to save his life, to guard his tracks—though he got thereby, pathetic creature, little comfort; the loathsome destroyer will live no longer, rotten with sin, but pain has seized him, grabbed him tightly in its fierce grip, its baleful bonds—and there he shall abide, guilty of his crimes, the greater judgment, how the shining Maker wishes to sentence him.”

Then the son of Ecglafe was more silent in boasting words about his battle-works after the noblemen, through the earl’s skill, looked on the hand over the high roof, the enemy’s fingers; at the end of each nail was a sharp tip, most like steel, heathen talons, the terrible spikes of that awful warrior; each of them agreed that not even the hardest of ancient and honorable irons could touch him, or injure at all the bloody battle-paw of that baleful creature.

Then it was quickly commanded that Heorot be adorned by hands inside; many there, men and women, prepared that wine-hall, the guest-house. Gold-dyed tapestries shone on the walls, many wonderful sights to any man who might look on them. That shining building was nearly shattered inside, entirely, fast in its iron bands, its hinges sprung; the roof alone survived unharmed, when that horrible creature, stained with foul deeds, turned in his flight, despairing of life. Death is not an easy thing to escape—try it who will—

1 in his finery Literally “in his adornments,” a peculiar phrase since Grendel is notoriously not armed and unadorned. Perhaps Beowulf means “covered in a garment of blood”?

2 son of Ecglafe I.e., Unfenth.
but compelled by necessity all must come to that place set aside for soul-bearers, children of men, dwellers on earth, where the body, fast on its bed of death, sleeps after the feast.

Then was the set time that the son of Healfdene went to the hall; the king himself wished to share in the feast. I have never heard of a greater host who bore themselves better before their treasure-giver. Those men in their glory moved to their benches, rejoiced in the feast; fairly those kinsmen took many a full mead-cup, stouthearted in the high hall, Hrothgar and Hrothulf. Heorot within was filled with friends—no false treacheries did the people of the Scyldings plot at that time. He gave to Beowulf the blade of Healfdene, a golden war-standard as a reward for victory, the bright banner, a helmet and byrnie, a great treasure-sword—many saw them borne before that man. Beowulf received the full cup in the hall, he felt no shame at that gift-giving before his bowmen; never have I heard tell of four treasures given more graciously, gold-adorned, from one man to another on the ale-benches.

On the crown of the helmet as a head-protector a ridge, wound with wire, stood without, so that the file-sharp swords might not terribly harm him, shower-hard, when shield-fighters had to go against hostile forces. The protector of eorls ordered eight horses with ornamented bridles led into the building, in under the eaves; on one sat

---

1 Implicit in this statement is the idea that, at some later time, the people of the Scyldings did plot false treacheries; from other sources it is possible to infer that after the death of Hrothgar, his nephew Hrothulf ruled rather than Hrethric, Hrothgar’s son. Many scholars assume that the story of some sort of treacherous usurpation was known to the audience; this gives a special urgency to much of what happens in these scenes of feasting, especially the speeches of Wealhtheow.

2 He gave ... Heathfēnē The translation follows the reading of Mitchell and Robinson, and see Bruce Mitchell, “Beowulf, line 1020b: brandæs beært?” The manuscript is usually emended to mean “The son of Healfdene gave to Beowulf.” a saddle, skillfully tooled, set with gemstones; that was the warseat of the high-king when the son of Healfdene sought to perform his swordplay—the widely-known warrior never failed at the front, when the slain fell about him. And the lord of the Ingwines gave ownership of both of them to Beowulf, the horses and weapons, bid him use them well. So manfully did the mighty prince, hoard-guard of warriors, reward the storm of battle with such steeds and treasures that none who will speak the truth rightfully could ever reproach them.

1050 Then the lord of earls, to each of those on the mead-benches who had made with Beowulf a sea-journey, gave jeweled treasures, antique heirlooms, and then ordered that gold be paid for the man whom Grendel had wickedly slain—he would have done more, if wise God and one man’s courage had not prevented that fate. The Maker ruled all of the race of mankind, as He still does. Therefore understanding is always best, spiritual foresight—he must face much, both love and hate, who long here endures this world in these days of strife.

Noise and music mingled together before the leader of Healfdene’s forces, the harp was touched, tales often told, when Hrothgar’s scop was set to recite among the mead-tables his hall-entertainment about the sons of Finn, surprised in ambush, when the hero of the Half-Danes, Hnæf the Scylding had to fall in a Frisian slaughter.
Hildeburh, indeed, had no need to praise the good faith of the Jutes.\(^1\) Guiltless, she was deprived of her dear ones in that shieldplay, her sons and brothers—sent forth to their fate, dispatched by spears; she was a sad lady! Not without cause did she mourn fate’s decrees, the daughter of Hoc, after daybreak came and she could see the slaughter of her kin under the very skies where once she held the greatest worldly joys. War took away all of the thanes of Finn, except a few, so that he could not continue at all a fight with Hengest on the battlefield, nor could that woeful remnant drive away the prince’s thane—so they offered them terms:\(^2\) they would clear out another hall for them, a house and high-seat, of which they should have half the control with the sons of the Jutes, and Folcwadla’s son,\(^3\) with feasting and gifts, should honor the Danes each and every day, gladden the troops of Hengest with gold rings and ancient treasures, ornamented gold, just as often as he would encourage the hosts of the Frisians in the beerhall.

They swore their pledges then on either side, a firm compact of peace. With unfeigned zeal Finn swore his oaths to Hengest, pledged that he, with the consent of his counselors, would support with honor those sad survivors, and that none should break their pact in word or deed, nor through malice should ever make mention, though they should serve their ring-giver’s slayer, without a lord, as they were led by need—and if, provoking, any Frisian spoke reminding them of all their murderous hate, then with the sword’s edge they should settle it. The oath\(^4\) was made ready, and ancient gold was brought from the hoard; the Battle-Scyldings’ best fighting-man was ready for the fire.

It was easy to see upon that pyre the bloodstained battle-shirt, the gilded swine, iron-hard boar-images, the noblemen with fatal wounds—so many felled by war! Then Hildeburh commanded at Hnæf’s pyre that her own son be consigned to the flames to be burnt, flesh and bone, placed on the pyre at his uncle’s shoulder; the lady sang a sad lament. The warrior ascended; to the clouds coiled the mighty funeral fire, and roared before their mound; their heads melted, their gashes burst open and spurted blood, the deadly body-bites. The flame devouring, most greedy spirit, those whom war destroyed of both peoples—their glory departed.

The warriors left to seek their native lands, bereft of friends, to behold Frisia, their homes and high fortresses. Hengest still stayed there with Finn that slaughter-stained winter, unwilling, desolate. He dreamt of home, though on the frozen sea he could not\(^5\) steer his ring-prowed ship—the ocean raged with storms, strove with the wind, and winter locked the waves in icy bonds, until there came another year to the courtyard—as it yet does, always observing its seasons and times, bright glorious weather. Gone was the winter, and fair the bosom of earth; the exile burned to take leave of that court, yet more he thought of stern vengeance than of sea-voyages, how he might arrange a hostile meeting, remind the Jutish sons of his iron sword. So he did not refuse the world’s custom when the son of Hunlaf\(^6\) placed a glinting sword,
the best of battle-flames, upon his lap;
its edge was not unknown among the Jutes.
And so, in turn, to the bold-minded Finn
befell cruel sword-evil in his own home,
when Guthlaf and Oslaf spoke of their grief,
the fierce attack after their sea voyage,
and cursed their wretched lot—the restless heart
could not restrain itself. The hall was stained with the lifeblood of foes, and Finn was slain,
the king among his host; the queen was seized.
The Scylding bowmen carried to their ships
all the house property of that earth-king,
whatever they could find in Finn’s homestead,
brooches and bright gems. On their sea journey
they bore that noble queen back to the Danes
and led her to her people.

The lay was sung,
the entertainer’s song. Glad sounds rose again,
the bench-noise glittered, cupbearers gave wine from wondrous vessels. Wealthereow came forth in her golden crown to where the good two
sat, nephew and uncle; their peace was still whole then,
each true to the other. Likewise Unferth, spokesman, sat
at the foot of the Scylding lord; everyone trusted
his spirit,
that he had great courage, though to his kinsmen he had not been merciful in sword-play. Then the lady of the Scyldings spoke:
“Take this cup, my noble courteous lord,
giver of treasure! Be truly joyful,
gold-friend of men, and speak to the Geats
in mild words, as a man should do!
Be gracious to the Geats, mindful of the gifts
which you now have from near and far.
I have been told that you would take this warrior
for your son. Heorot is cleansed,
the bright ring-hall—use your many rewards
while you can, and leave to your kinsmen
the folk and kingdom, when you must go forth
to face the Maker’s decree. I know that my own
dear gracious Hrothulf will hold in honors
these youths, if you should give up the world
before him, friend of the Scyldings;
I expect that he would wish to repay
both our sons kindly, if he recalls all
the pleasures and honors that we have shown him,
in our kindness, since he was a child.”
She turned to the bench where her boys sat,
Hræthric and Hrothmund, and the hero’s son,
all the youths together; the good man,
Beowulf the Geat, sat between the brothers.

The flagon was borne to him, a friendly greeting
conveyed with words, and wound gold
offered with good will, two armlets,
garments and rings, and the greatest neck-collar
ever heard of anywhere on earth.
Under heaven I have not heard tell of a better
hoard-treasure of heroes, since Hama carried off to the bright city the Brosinga necklace; the gem and its treasures; he fled the treachery
of Eormanric, chose eternal counsel.

Hygelac the Geat on his last journey
had that neck-ring, nephew of Swerting,
when under the banner he defended his booty,
the spoils of slaughter. Fate struck him down
when in his pride he went looking for woe,
a feud with the Frisians. He wore that finery,
those precious stones, over the cup of the sea,
that powerful lord, and collapsed under his shield.

Into Frankish hands came the life of that king,
his breast-garments, and the great collar too;
a lesser warrior looted the corpses
mown down in battle; Geatish men

hunleafing as the name of a sword.

spokesman The Old English word thyle has been variously interpreted, from “court jester” to “official speechmaker.” The present translation grants Unferth a measure of dignity and position to which, perhaps, he is not entitled.

1 Brosinga necklace The Brosinga necklace had apparently been worn by the Norse goddess Freya. Nothing much is known of Hama, who apparently stole the necklace from Eormanric, famous king of the Goths. The “bright city” and “eternal counsel” may refer to his retreat into a monastery and Christianity (a story told in the Old Norse Thidreksaga), though this is not entirely certain.

2 Hygelac … neck-ring The first of several mentions of Hygelac’s ill-fated raid against the Frisians. Later we are told that Beowulf gives the necklace to Hygd, Hygelac’s wife; she apparently let him borrow it when he went on his piratical raid.
held that killing field.

The hall swallowed the noise.

Wealthwine stood before the company and spoke:
“Beowulf, beloved warrior, wear this neck-ring in good health, and enjoy this war-garment, treasure of a people, and prosper well, be bold and clever, and to these boys be mild in counsel—I will remember you for that. You have made it so that men will praise you far and near, forever and ever, as wide as the seas, home of the winds, surround the shores of earth. Be while you live blessed, o nobleman! I wish you well with these bright treasures. Be to my sons kind in your deeds, keeping them in joys!

Here each earl is true to the other, mild in his heart, loyal to his liege-lord, the thanes united, the nation alert; the troop, having drunk at my table, will do as I bid.”

She went to her seat. The best of feasts it was—the men drank wine, and did not know wyrd, the cruel fate which would come to pass for many an earl once evening came, and Hrothgar departed to his own dwelling, the mighty one to his rest. Countless men guarded that hall, as they often had before.

They cleared away bench-planks, spread cushions and bedding on the floor. One of those beer-drinkers lay down to his rest fated, ripe for death. They set at their heads their round battle-shields, bright boards; there on the bench was easily seen over the noblemen the high battle-helmet, the ringed byrnie, the mighty wooden spear. It was their custom to be always ready, armed for battle, at home or in the field, every one of them, on whatever occasion their overlord had need of them; that was a good troop.

They sank into sleep—one paid sorely for his evening rest, as had often happened when Grendel guarded that gold-hall, committed his wrongs until he came to his end, died for his sins. It was clearly seen, obvious to all men, that an avenger still lived on after that enemy for a long time after that grim battle—Grendel’s mother, monster-woman, remembered her misery, she who dwelt in those dreadful waters, the cold streams, ever since Cain killed with his blade his only brother, his father’s kin; he fled bloodstained, marked for murder, left the joys of men, dwelled in the wasteland. From him awoke many a fateful spirit—Grendel among them, hateful accursed foe, who found at Heorot a wakeful warrior waiting for battle. There the great beast began to seize him, but he remembered his mighty strength, the ample gifts which God had given him, and trusted the Almighty for mercy, favor and support; thus he overcame the fiend, subdued the hellish spirit. He went away wretched, deprived of joy, to find his place of death, mankind’s foe. But his mother still greedy, grim-minded, wanted to go on her sorrowful journey to avenge her son’s death.

She reached Heorot, where the Ring-Danes slept throughout the building; sudden turnabout came to men, when Grendel’s mother broke into the hall. The horror was less by as much as a maiden’s strength, a woman’s warfare, is less than an armed man’s when a bloodstained blade, its edges strong, hammer-forged sword, slices through the boar-image on a helmet opposite.1 Then in the hall was the hard edge drawn, swords over seats, many a broad shield raised in hands—none remembered his helmet or broad mail-shirt when that terror seized them. She came in haste and meant to hurry out, save her life, when she was surprised there, but she had quickly seized, fast in her clutches, one nobleman when she went to the fens. He was the dearest of heroes to Hrothgar among his comrades between the two seas, mighty shield-warrior, whom she snatched from his rest,

---

1 The horror … opposite In fact Grendel’s mother is a much more dangerous opponent for Beowulf; the point of these lines is not clear.
a glorious thane. Beowulf was not there, but another place had been appointed for the famous Gæat after the treasure-giving. Heorot was in an upum—she took the famous hand, covered in gore; care was renewed, come again to the dwellings. That was no good exchange, that those on both sides should have to bargain with the lives of friends.

Then the wise old king, gray-bearded warrior, was grieved at heart when he learned that he no longer lived—the dearest of men, his chief thane, was dead. Quickly Beowulf was fetched to the chambers, victory-blessed man. Just before dawn that noble champion came with his companions, went with his men to where the old king waited wondering whether the Almighty would ever work a change after his tidings of woe. Across the floor walked the worthy warrior with his small troop—the hall-wood resounded—and with his words he addressed the wise one, lord of the Ingwines, asked him whether the night had been agreeable, after his urgent summons.

Hrothgar spoke, protector of the Scyldings:

"Ask not of joys! Sorrow is renewed for the Danish people. Æscher is dead, elder brother of Yrmenlaf, my confidant and my counselor, my shoulder-companion in every conflict when we defended our heads when the footsoldiers clashed and struck boar-helmets. As a nobleman should be, always excellent, so Æscher was! In Heorot he was slain by the hand of a restless death-spirit; I do not know where that ghoul went, floating with its carcass, rejoicing in its feast. She avenged that feud in which you killed Grendel yesterday evening in your violent way with a crushing vice-grip, for he had diminished and destroyed my people for far too long. He fell in battle, it cost him his life, and now has come another mighty evil marauder who means to avenge her kin, and too far has carried out her revenge, as it may seem to many a thane whose spirit groans for his treasure-giver, a hard heart’s distress—now that hand lies dead which was wont to give you all good things.

I have heard countrymen and hall-counselors among my people report this: they have seen two such creatures, great march-stalkers holding the moors, alien spirits. The second of them, as far as they could discern most clearly, had the shape of a woman; the other, misshapen, marched the exile’s path in the form of a man, except that he was larger than any other; in bygone days he was called ‘Grendel’ by the local folk. They knew no father, whether before him had been begotten any more mysterious spirits. That murky land they hold, wolf-haunted slopes, windy headlands, awful fenpaths, where the upland torrents plunge downward under the dark crags, the flood underground. It is not far hence—measured in miles—that the mere stands; over it hangs a grove hoar-frosted, a firm-rooted wood looming over the water.

Every night one can see there an awesome wonder, fire on the water. There lives none so wise or bold that he can fathom its abyss. Though the heath-stepper beset by hounds, the strong-horned hart, might seek the forest, pursued from afar, he will sooner lose his life on the shore than save his head and go in the lake—it is no good place! The clashing waves climb up from there dark to the clouds, when the wind drives the violent storms, until the sky itself droops, the heavens groan. Now once again all help depends on you alone. You do not yet know this fearful place, where you might find the sinful creature—seek it if you dare!

I will reward you with ancient riches for that feud, as I did before, with twisted gold, if you return alive.”
Beowulf, son of Ecgtheow:
“Sorrow not, wise one! It is always better
to avenge one’s friend than to mourn overmuch.
Each of us shall abide the end
of this world’s life; let him who can
bring about fame before death—that is best
for the unliving man after he is gone.

Beowulf spoke, son of Ecgtheow:
1385
to avenge one’s friend than to mourn overmuch.
Each of us shall abide the end
of this world’s life; let him who can
bring about fame before death—that is best
for the unliving man after he is gone.

Arise, kingdom’s guard, let us quickly go
and inspect the path of Grendel’s kin.
I promise you this: he will find no protection—
not in the belly of the earth nor the bottom of the sea,
or the mountain groves—let him go where he will!

For today, you must endure patiently
all your woes, as I expect you will.”
The old man leapt up, thanked the Lord,
the mighty God, for that man’s speech.

Then for Hrothgar a horse was bridled
with plaited mane. The wise prince rode in full array; footsoldiers marched with shields at the ready. The tracks were seen
far and wide on the forest paths,
a trail through the woods, where she went forth
over the murky moor, bore the young man’s lifeless body, the best of all those who had held watch over Hrothgar’s home.
The son of nobles crossed over
the steep stone cliffs, the constricted climb,
a narrow solitary path, a course unknown,
the towering headlands, home of sea-monsters.
He went before with just a few
wise men to see the way,
until suddenly he saw mountain-trees,
stunted and leaning over gray stone,
a joyless wood; the water went under,
turbid and dreary. To all the Danes,
the men of the Scyldings, many a thane,
it was a sore pain at heart to suffer,
a grief to every earl, when on the seaciff
they came upon the head of Æschere.
The flood boiled with blood—the folk gazed on—
and hot gore. At times a horn sang its eager war-song. The footsoldiers sat down.

They saw in the water many kinds of serpents,
strange sea-creatures testing the currents,
and on the sloping shores lay such monsters
as often attend in early morning
a sorrowful journey on the sail-road,
dragons and wild beasts. They rushed away
bitter, enraged; they heard the bright noise,
the sound of the battle-horn. A Geatish Bowman cut short the life of one of those swimmers
with a bow and arrow, so that in his body stood
the hard war-shaft; he was a slower swimmer
on the waves, when death took him away.
At once in the water he was assailed
with the barbed hooks of boar-pikes,
violently attacked and dragged ashore,
the strange wave-roamer; the men inspected
this grisly visitor.

Beowulf geared up
in his warrior’s clothing, cared not for his life.
The broad war-shirt, woven by hand,
cunningly made, had to test the mere—
it knew well how to protect his bone-house
so that a battle-grip might not hurt his breast
nor an angry malicious clutch touch his life.
The shining helmet protected his head,
set to stir up the sea’s depths,
seek that troubled water, decorated with treasure,
encircled with a splendid band, as a weapon-smith
in days of old had crafted it with wonders,
set boar-images, so that after wards
no blade or battle-sword might ever bite it.

Not the smallest of powerful supports was that
which Hrothgar’s spokesman lent him at need;
that hilted sword was named Hrunting,
unique among ancient treasures—
its edge was iron, etched with poison-stripes,
hardened with the blood of war; it had never failed
any man who grasped it in his hands in battle,
who dared to undertake a dreadful journey
into the very home of the foe—it was not the first time
that it had to perform a work of high courage.

Truly, the son of Ecglf, crafty in strength,
did not remember what he had said before,
drunk with wine, when he lent that weapon
to a better swordsman; he himself did not dare to risk his life under the rushing waves, perform a lordly act; for that he lost honor, his fame for courage. Not so with the other, when he had geared himself up for battle.

22

Beowulf spoke, son of Ecgtheow:
“Consider now, famous kinsman of Healfdene, wise prince, now that I am eager to depart, gold-friend to men, what we spoke of before: if ever in your service I should lose my life, that you would always be in a father’s place to me when I have passed away.

Be a protector to my band of men, my boon-companions, if battle should take me, and send on to Hygelac, beloved Hrothgar, the gifts of treasure which you have given me. The lord of the Geats will understand by that gold, the son of Hrethel will see by that treasure, that I found a ring-giver who was good in ancient customs and, while I could, enjoyed it. And let Unferth have that ancient heirloom, that well-known man have my wave-patterned sword, hard-edged, splendid; with Huntung I shall win honor and fame, or death will take me!”

After these words the Weder-Geat man hastened boldly, by no means wished to stay for an answer; the surging sea received the brave soldier. It was the space of a day1 before he could perceive the bottom.

Right away she who held that expanse of water, bloodthirsty and fierce, for a hundred half-years, grim and greedy, perceived that some man was exploring from above that alien land. She snatched at him, seized the warrior in her savage clutches, but none the sooner injured his sound body—the ring-mail encircled him, so that she could not pierce that war-dress, the locked coat of mail, with her hostile claws. Then that she-wolf of the sea swam to the bottom, and bore the prince of rings into her abode, so that he might not—no matter how strong—

wield his weapons, but so many wonders set upon him in the water, many a sea-beast with battle-tusks tearing at his war-shirt, monsters pursuing him.2

Then the earl perceived that he was in some sort of battle-hall where no water could harm him in any way, and, for the hall’s roof, he could not be reached by the flood’s sudden rush—he saw a fire-light, a glowing blaze shining brightly. Then the worthy man saw that water-witch, a great mere-wife; he gave a mighty blow with his battle-sword—he did not temper that stroke—so that the ring-etched blade rang out on her head a greedy battle-song. The guest discovered then that the battle-flame would not bite, or wound her fatally—but the edge failed the man in his need; it had endured many hand-to-hand meetings, often sheared through helmets, fated war-garments. It was the first time that the fame of that precious treasure had fallen. Again he was stalwart, not slow of zeal, mindful of glory, that kinsman of Hygelac—the angry challenger threw away that etched blade, wrapped and ornamented, so that it lay on the earth, strong, steel-edged. He trusted his strength, the might of his handgrip—as a man should do if by his warfare he thinks to win long-lasting praise: he cares nothing for his life. The man of the War-Geats grabbed by the shoulder Grendel’s mother—he had no regret for that feud; battle-hardened, enraged, he swung her around, his deadly foe, so she fell to the ground. Quickly she gave him requital for that with a grim grasp, and grappled him to her—wary, he stumbled, strongest of warriors, of foot-soldiers, and took a fall.

She set upon her hall-guest and drew her knife, broad, bright-edged; she would avenge her boy, her only offspring. On his shoulders lay the linked corselet; it defended his life, prevented the entrance of point and blade.

There the son of Ecgtheow would have ended his life

1 It was the space of a day  Or “it was daylight.”

2 pursuing him  Or “attacked their adversary.” The Old English word æglaecan may refer here to Beowulf or to the sea-monsters.
under the wide ground, the Geatish champion,
had not his armored shirt offered him help,
the hard battle-net, and holy God
brought about war-victory—the wise Lord,
Ruler of the heavens, decided it rightly,
easily, once he stood up again.

23

He saw among the armor a victorious blade,
ancient giant-sword strong in its edges,
an honor in battle; it was the best of weapons,
except that it was greater than any other man
might even bear into the play of battle,
good, adorned, the work of giants. The Scyldings’ champion seized its linked hilt, fierce and ferocious, drew the ring-marked sword
despairing of his life, struck in fury
so that it caught her hard in the neck,
broke her bone-rings; the blade cut through
the doomed flesh—she fell to the floor,
the sword was bloody, the soldier rejoiced.

The flames gleamed, a light glowed within
even as from heaven clearly shines
the firmament’s candle. He looked around the chamber,
passed by the wall, hefted the weapon
hard by its hilt, that thane of Hygelac,
angry and resolute—nor was the edge useless
to that warrior, but he quickly wished
to pay back Grendel for the many battle-storms
which he had wrought on the West-Danes
much more often than on one occasion,
when Hrothgar’s hall-companions
he slew in their beds, devoured sleeping
fifteen men of the Danish folk,
and made off with as many more,
a loathsome booty. He paid him back for that,
the fierce champion, for on a couch he saw Grendel lying lifeless,
battle-weary from the wound he received in the combat at Heorot. His corpse burst open
when he was dealt a blow after death,
a hard sword-stroke, and his head chopped off.

Soon the wise men saw it,
those who kept watch on the water with Hrothgar—
all turbid were the waves, and troubled,
the sea stained with blood. The graybearded
elders spoke together about the good one,
said they did not expect that nobleman
would return, triumphant, to seek the mighty prince; to many it seemed
that the sea-wolf had destroyed him.
The ninth hour came; the noble Scyldings
abandoned the headland, and home went the gold-friend of men. The guests’ sat
sick at heart, and stared into the mere;
they wished, but did not hope, that they would
see their lord himself.

Then the sword began,
that blade, to waste away into battle-icicles
from the war-blood; it was a great wonder
that it melted entirely, just like ice
when the Father loosens the frost’s fetters,
unwraps the water’s bonds—He wields power
times and seasons; that is the true Maker.
The man of the Geats took no more precious treasures
from that place—though he saw many there—
than the head, and the hilt as well,
bright with gems; the blade had melted,
the ornamented sword burned up; so hot was the blood
of the poisonous alien spirit who died in there.
Soon he was swimming who had survived in battle
the downfall of his enemies, dove up through the water;
the sea-currents were entirely cleansed,
the spacious regions, when that alien spirit
gave up life-days and this loaned world.

The defender of seafarers came to land,
swam stout-hearted; he rejoiced in his sea-booty,
the great burden which he brought with him.
That splendid troop of thanes went towards him,
thanked God, rejoiced in their prince,
that they might see him safe and sound.
Then from that bold man helmet and byrnie
were quickly unstrapped. Under the clouds
the mere stewed, stained with gore.
They went forth, followed the trail,
rejoicing in their hearts; they marched along the road,

1 the work of giants Old, highly-praised weapons are often called
“the work of giants” —whether this reference is meant to connect the sword to the giants “who fought against God” is not clear.

2 guests I.e., the Geats who had come to Heorot with Beowulf.
the familiar path; proud as kings
they carried the head from the sea-cliff
with great trouble, even for two pairs
of stout-hearted men; four of them had to bear, with some strain, on a battle-pole
Grendel’s head to the gold-hall,
until presently fourteen proud
and battle-hardy Geats came to the hall,
warriors marching; the lord of those men,
mighty in the throng, trod the meadhall-plain.
Then the ruler of thanes entered there,
daring in actions, honored in fame,
battle-brave hero, to greet Hrothgar.
Then, where men were drinking, they dragged by its hair
Grendel’s head across the hall-floor,
a grisly spectacle for the men and the queen.
Everyone stared at that amazing sight.

Beowulf spoke, son of Ecgtheow:
“Look! son of Healfdene, prince of the Scyldings,
we have brought you gladly these gifts from the sea
which you gaze on here, a token of glory.
Not easily did I escape with my life
that undersea battle, did my brave deed
with difficulty—indeed, the battle would have been
over at once, if God had not guarded me.
Nor could I achieve anything at that battle
with Hunting, though that weapon is good;
but the Ruler of Men granted to me
that I might see on the wall a gigantic old sword, hanging glittering—He has always guided
the friendless one—so I drew that weapon.
In that conflict, when I had the chance, I slew
the shepherds of that house. Then that battle-sword burned up with its ornaments, as the blood shot out, hottest battle-sweat. I have brought the hilt
back from the enemy; I avenged the old deeds,
the slaughter of Danes, as seemed only right.
Now you have my word that you may in Heorot
sleep without care with your company of men,
and every thane, young and old,
in your nation; you need fear nothing,
prince of the Scyldings, from that side,
no deadly manslaughters, as you did before.”

Then the golden hilt was placed in the hand
of the gray-haired war-chief, wise old leader,
that old work of giants; it came to the keeping
of the Danish lord after the fall of demons,
a work of wonder-smiths; and when that evil-hearted man,
God’s adversary, gave up the world,
guilty of murders—and his mother too—
it passed to the possession of the best
of world-kings between the two seas,
of all those that dealt out treasures in Danish lands.
Hrothgar spoke—he studied the hilt
of the old heirloom, where was written1 the origin
of ancient strife, when the flood slew,
rushing seas, the race of giants—
they suffered awfully. That was a people alien to the eternal Lord; a last reward
the Ruler gave them through the raging waters.
Also, on the sword-guard of bright gold
was rightly marked in rune-letters,
set down and said for whom that sword,
best of irons, had first been made,
with scrolly and serpentine patterns. Then spoke
the wise son of Healfdene—all fell silent:
“One may, indeed, say, if he acts in truth
and right for the people, remembers all,
old guardian of his homeland, that this earl was born a better man! My friend Beowulf,
your glory is exalted throughout the world,
over every people; you hold it all with patient care,
and temper strength with wisdom. To you I shall fulfill our friendship, as we have said. You shall become a comfort everlasting to your own people,
and a help to heroes.

Not so was Heremod
to the sons of Ecgwala,2 the Honor-Scyldings;3
he grew not for their delight, but for their destruction
and the murder of Danish men.
Enraged, he cut down his table-companions,
comrades-in-arms, until he turned away alone
from the pleasures of men, that famous prince;
though mighty God exalted him in the joys

1 written Or “carved.” It is not clear whether the scene is visual or textual, depicted or written in (presumably runic) characters.
2 Ecgwala A king of Danes.
3 Honor-Scyldings I.e., Danes.
utter sad songs and speak of that man; they praised his lordship and his proud deeds, judged well his prowess. As it is proper that one should praise his lord with words, should love him in his heart when the fatal hour comes, when he must from his body be led forth, so the men of the Geats lamented the fall of their prince, those hearth-companions; they said that he was of all the kings of the world the mildest of men and the most gentle, the kindest to his folk and the most eager for fame.

---

In Context

Background Material

Glossary of Proper Names

<table>
<thead>
<tr>
<th>Name</th>
<th>Description</th>
</tr>
</thead>
<tbody>
<tr>
<td>Abel</td>
<td>Slain by his brother Cain; the story is told in Genesis 4.1–16</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Ælfhere</td>
<td>Kinman of Wiglaf</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Æscere</td>
<td>A prominent Dane, advisor to Hrothgar; slain by Grendel’s mother</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Battle-Scyldings</td>
<td>See Scyldings</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Battle-Scyffings</td>
<td>See Scyfings</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Beanstan</td>
<td>Father of Breca</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Beowulf</td>
<td>(Prologue) Danish king, son of Scyld</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Bright-Danes</td>
<td>See Danes</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Brondings</td>
<td>The people of Breca</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Brosinga</td>
<td>Makers of the magical necklace of Freya in Norse myth, to which a necklace in the story is compared</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Cain</td>
<td>Slayer of Abel in Genesis 4.1–16; father of the race of monsters</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Dæghrefn</td>
<td>A warrior of the Hugas slain by Beowulf in hand-to-hand combat during Hygelac’s ill-fated raid on Frisia</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Danes</td>
<td>Hrothgar’s people; the Scyldings; also called Bright-, Half-, Ring-, Spear-, East-, West-, North-, and South-Danes</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Eadgils</td>
<td>Son of Othhere, brother of Eanmund</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Eanmund</td>
<td>Son of Othhere, brother of Eadgils; slain by Weohstan</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>East-Danes</td>
<td>See Danes</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Egglaf</td>
<td>Father of Unferth</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Ecgtheow</td>
<td>Father of Beowulf</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Ecgwala</td>
<td>A Danish king; the “sons of Ecgwala” are the Danes</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Eofor</td>
<td>A warrior of the Geats; brother of Wulf; slayer of Ongentheow</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Eomer</td>
<td>Son of Offa</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Eormanric</td>
<td>King of the Ostrogoths</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Eotens</td>
<td>Unclear: perhaps the Jutes, perhaps the Frisians, perhaps “giants” (the literal meaning of the word) as a nickname for one group or the other</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Finn</td>
<td>King of the Frisians, husband of Hildeburh; killed by Hengest</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Finns</td>
<td>The people of Finland; the Lapps</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Fitela</td>
<td>Legendary companion, nephew (and son) of Sigemund</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Folcwaldal</td>
<td>Father of Finn</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Franks</td>
<td>A Germanic tribe; see Hetware, Hugas, Merovingians</td>
</tr>
</tbody>
</table>

---
Freawaru daughter of Hrothgar, betrothed to Ingeld
Frisians a Germanic tribe; Finn’s people
Froda chief of the Heathobards, father of Ingeld
Garmund father of Offa
Geats Hygelac’s people and Beowulf’s; a Germanic tribe; also called War-Geats, Hræthmen, Hræthlings, Weders
Githnas an East-Germanic tribe
Grendel descendent of Cain; monstrous marauder of the Danes
Guthlaf a Danish warrior, companion of Hengest
Hæreth father of Hygd
Hæthcyn Geatish prince, second son of Hræthel
Half-Danes see Danes
Halga Danish prince, younger brother of Hrothgar
Hama legendary Goth; stole Brocsinga necklace
Healfdene king of the Danes, father of Hrothgar
Heardred king of the Geats, son of Hygelac
Heathobards Ingeld’s people; a Germanic tribe
Heatholaf a Wylfing slain by Ecgtheow
Heathorean a Scandinavian tribe; Norwegians, more or less Helming the family of Wealththeow
Hemming kinsman of Offa and Eomer
Hengest leader of the Danes; killed Finn in Frisia
Heorogar Dane, eldest brother of Hrothgar
Heorot the great hall of Hrothgar
Heoroweard Dane; son of Heorogar
Herebeald Geatish prince, eldest son of Hræthel; killed by his brother Hæthcyn
Heremod king of the Danes in the poem’s distant past, before the Scylding dynasty
Hereric brother of Hygd, uncle of Heardred
Hetware a Frankish tribe, allied with the Frisians; fought against Hygelac
Hildeburh sister of the Danish Hnæf, wife of the Frisian Finn
Hnæf chief of the Half-Danes, brother of Hildeburh; killed by Finn
Hoc Dane, father of Hildeburh and Hnæf
Hondscio Geatish warrior, comrade of Beowulf; slain by Grendel
Honor-Sclydings see Scyldings
Hræthel king of the Geats, father of Hygelac, grandfather of Beowulf
Hræthlings sons of Hræthel, i.e., the Geats
Hræthmen the Geats
Hræthic Dane, son of Hrothgar
Hrothgar aged king of the Danes beset by Grendel; helped by Beowulf
Hrothmund Dane, son of Hrothgar
Hrothulf Dane, son of Halga, nephew of Hrothgar; not to be trusted
Hrunting the sword of Unferth
Hugas the Franks, allies of the Frisians
Hunlaf father of one of the warriors in Hengest’s troop
Hygd queen of the Geats, wife of Hygelac, daughter of Hæreth
Hygelac king of the Geats, uncle of Beowulf
Ingeld prince of the Heathobards, son of Froda, betrothed to Freawaru; after the events narrated in the poem he burns down the great hall of Heorot
Ingwines | the “friends of Ing”: the Danes
Jutes | allies of the Frisians; see Eotens
Merovingians | the Franks
Nægling | Beowulf’s sword
North-Danes | see Danes
Offa | king of the Angles, husband of Thryth
Othhere | Swede, son of Ongentheow
Onela | Swede, son of Ongentheow; usurped throne
Ongentheow | Swedish king; killed by Wulf and Eofor
Oslaf | a Danish warrior, companion of Hengest
Ring-Danes | see Danes
Scyld Seafing | legendary founder of the Danish royal family
Scyldings | the Danes; also called Battle-, Honor-, Victory-Scyldings
Scyldings | the Swedes
Sigemund | legendary Germanic hero, son of Wæls
South-Danes | see Danes
Spear-Danes | see Danes
Swerting | uncle of Hygelac
Thryth | (often construed as Modthryth) wife of Offa
Unferth | Danish spokesman (“thyle”) and courtier of Hrothgar
Victory-Scyldings | see Scyldings
Volung | another name for Sigemund, son of Wæls
Wægmundings | the family of Weohstan, Wiglaf, and Beowulf
Wæls | father of Sigemund
War-Geats | see Geats
Wealththeow | Danish queen, wife of Hrothgar
Weders | the Geats
Welch | legendary Germanic smith
Wendels | a Germanic tribe; perhaps the Vandals, perhaps not
Weohstan | father of Wiglaf; killed Eanmund
West-Danes | see Danes
Wiglaf | son of Weohstan, young retainer of Beowulf
Withergyld | a dead Heathobard
Wonred | a Geat, father of Wulf and Eofor
Wulf | a warrior of the Geats, brother of Eofor; assisted in killing Ongentheow
Wulfgar | a warrior of the Danes; herald at the court of Hrothgar
Wylfings | a Germanic tribe of which Heatholaf was a member, until Ecgtheow killed him
Yrmenlaf | a Dane, younger brother of Æscher