Dear Mr. President,

My name is Enzo, I'm 10 years old and I'm a fifth grade student at my new school Dwight. I know that many schools in the U.S.A do not have access to high-speed internet. I would like to ask you some questions about how you might handle these events. What are you doing to help these schools?

For example, at Dwight school students from 3rd to 7th grade get iPads to work on projects and interact with people such as, friends from school, teachers and websites. We also have computers in our own classrooms which we use most of the time to do reflections. Also there is a research that Bitz Mõnuiz, a researcher of schools, has proved that 40% of the United States schools don't have access to high-speed internet.

I'm new here at Dwight and it's my first school using iPads. It has helped me with a lot of lessons to keep me organized because it's better to have everything in my iPad instead of papers so it wouldn't be messy. There was this project that we had to do about the human brain in 5th grade. If I didn't use my iPad or computer it would have taken one month, but in fact, it took two weeks when I used my iPad. So, what's your plan B?

Sincerely,

Enzo Palaci Zani
