ABSTRACT

There are many well-known organizations that understand the importance of investing in education at all levels, from pre-kindergarten through to college level classes. Not only are these organizations investing in students but some are also investing in their communities. This paper will highlight several of these organizations such as Nestle, Chevron, Hess, and United Technologies Corporation and will look at the benefits they gain from the experience as well as the downsides. Additionally, we will discuss why organizations find such an investment necessary and how they plan on continuing to evolve these investments and programs in the future.
