Lessons Learned

Hypothesis:

We initially thought that people who were looking for restaurants online were having a difficult time finding more unconventional food spots or food events such as festivals. So we to differentiate ourselves from existing platforms we thought we would cater to these types of locations.

Experiment:

Interviewed people to find out what problems people currently have with the current restaurant locator apps. We also wanted to figure out if we should narrow our focus to primarily supporting local/unconventional food spots.

Results:

From our interviews, we realized that people care about presentation of a dish/restaurant to determine whether or not they can trust their food and service. Our startup phase along with theirs would be supporting each other in order to ensure quality and service. A lot of people also rely a lot more on advice from friends and family over strangers and paid promotions.

Action:

Develop a platform that offers the advice from close connections and bring smaller businesses to their attention. We would filter out bigger/chain restaurants so people can find local restaurants easily. Work closely with each restaurant that decides to partner with us to promote this exclusivity.

Questions for interview

1. Who/what do you trust the most when asking for restaurant/food recommendations and why?
2. When you decide to eat out, what type of places do you consider the most?
3. How would you change the way you find food today if you could?
4. On any restaurant location apps/sites you use currently (i.e. Yelp, Google Search, Opentable, etc.) are there any features or functions that you wish it had that it does not currently? What features or functions do you think these companies should stop doing?
5. When searching where to eat/what to eat, do you consider eating at local/unconventional food spots instead of restaurants?
6. On a scale on 1-10 how much do you enjoy eating at local/unconventional food spots?
7. If there was an app that caters to just finding local/unconventional food vendors and food festivals, would you buy/use it?
8. Do you find it easier or more difficult finding places to eat when you are travelling versus in your local area on the current apps/sites you use to find restaurants?
9. Have you ever attended a food festival? Did you enjoy eating there? How did you find out about the festival?
10. Do you think pictures on Yelp, Grubhub, Seamless, Caviar, Local Eats are useful for branding restaurants food?
