INTRODUCTION

Tribal Colleges and Universities (TCUs) are leading the nation in producing a highly educated and skilled Native workforce. They are unique institutions that combine personal attention with cultural relevance, encouraging American Indians to succeed in higher education and beyond. They admit students wherever they are on the education continuum, and because of their commitment to providing opportunities to all Native students, tuition rates are among the lowest in the nation. Tribal college students are well prepared to pursue rewarding careers and many graduate free of student debt.

Currently, there are 35 accredited TCUs in North America, operating 75 campuses in 16 states. They offer nearly 600 awards, endorsements, diplomas, certificates, apprenticeships, and degree programs. Sixteen TCUs offer baccalaureate programs and five have master’s degree programs.

Serving more than 15,000 students and 100,000 community members annually, they provide access to higher education for more than 80% of Indian Country. American Indians comprise approximately 86% of the student body at TCUs and 44% of the faculty.

As public institutions of higher education, TCUs are chartered by their respective tribes or by the federal government. Their mission is to protect and sustain tribal lands, languages, cultures, and sovereignty and to restore identity and pride in each one of their students. In addition to their academic programs, TCUs provide job training, and technical and vocational education to prepare students for the workforce. TCUs enhance their communities through after-school reading programs, language instruction, gardening classes, firefighter certification, computer literacy courses, health and wellness classes, and many other extended learning opportunities. Perhaps most importantly, TCUs are vibrant community hubs that bring people together, working to uplift Native nations.

ABOUT TRIBAL COLLEGE JOURNAL

Tribal College Journal of American Indian Higher Education (TCJ) is a print and digital magazine based in Mancos, Colorado. TCJ serves as the “voice and vision” of the tribal college movement, which has been called “the single greatest experiment and experience in American Indian self-determination.” Articles address topics such as Indigenous language revitalization, food sovereignty, cultural curriculum, and health and wellness. The journal also publishes groundbreaking scholarship that bridges Western and traditional educational philosophies, including research on Native philosophies of learning and cultural perspectives on science and the environment. Each fall, Tribal College Journal publishes an annual creative writing publication entitled TCJ Student. In a world where American Indians are often stereotyped or ignored, the students contributing to TCJ Student write with biting satire and gentle humor about what it really means to be Native. TCJ Student is published both in print and online at www.tcjstudent.org.
