

The CEHV presents a CARE Panel:

The Ethics of Paying Research Subjects

Tuesday, October 22, 2019
Thompson Library 165
12-1:30pm

art credit: John Malita

Panelists:

Govind Persad

Law, University of Denver

Maria F. Gallo

College of Public Health
Division of Epidemiology, OSU

Amanda Robinson

Political Science, OSU

For more info and to register, please visit:
go.osu.edu/carersvp

It is common practice to offer payment to research subjects, either to enhance recruitment or to enable people to participate without financial sacrifice. While common, the practice is highly contentious. Some worry that paying subjects unduly influences their choice to participate, by impairing their judgment or by giving them an offer they cannot refuse. Others argue that we do not pay research participants enough, making participation for research overly burdensome for some already marginalized populations. This panel will debate these concerns. Questions that will be discussed include the following: Is it ever wrong to offer money for research participation? Is some payment too much or too little? What alternatives to monetary compensation are appropriate? Who should decide how much research subjects get paid?

The Center for Ethics and Human Values' CARE program is funded by the Office of Research with support from the OSUMC Center for Bioethics and the College of Public Health.