arguments for the existence of God:

John Hick:

1970

Argument for the existence

Hence, no 3

c

b

A

B

C
The conclusion is that, since there is a greater, a contrary cannot be conceded in any way at all. It is not possible for there to be. Therefore, it is true that there is a greater, a contrary cannot be conceded, and so this splits into three different forms, which I have used.

The formal conclusion is thus: that, since there is a greater, a contrary cannot be conceded in any way at all. It is not possible for there to be. Therefore, it is true that there is a greater, a contrary cannot be conceded, and so this splits into three different forms, which I have used.

The formal conclusion is thus: that, since there is a greater, a contrary cannot be conceded in any way at all. It is not possible for there to be. Therefore, it is true that there is a greater, a contrary cannot be conceded, and so this splits into three different forms, which I have used.

The formal conclusion is thus: that, since there is a greater, a contrary cannot be conceded in any way at all. It is not possible for there to be. Therefore, it is true that there is a greater, a contrary cannot be conceded, and so this splits into three different forms, which I have used.

The formal conclusion is thus: that, since there is a greater, a contrary cannot be conceded in any way at all. It is not possible for there to be. Therefore, it is true that there is a greater, a contrary cannot be conceded, and so this splits into three different forms, which I have used.

The formal conclusion is thus: that, since there is a greater, a contrary cannot be conceded in any way at all. It is not possible for there to be. Therefore, it is true that there is a greater, a contrary cannot be conceded, and so this splits into three different forms, which I have used.
cannot be conceived. (11) Because God's existence is necessary, He must exist necessarily, and hence He is not conceived. But every concept is an idea which is a cause of a necessary thing. Hence, if God is conceived, He must exist necessarily as a necessary concept.

The concept of God is, therefore, a necessary concept, and hence it cannot be conceived. Hence, God's existence is necessary.

It follows that if God is conceived, He must exist necessarily. If God is conceived, He exists necessarily. Hence, He must exist.